

At the Ketchum, Idaho, home of Mary Lynn and Rusty Turner, custom-made steel bookcases line the walls of the dining area in the great room; the wood-and-iron chandelier and oak dining table are by Lucca Studio; the chairs are slipcovered in herringbone linen, and the rug by F. J. Hakimian is made of vintage kilim panels. FACING PAGE: The house is situated along the Big Wood River, one of the many picturesque waterways in the region. See Resources.

PEAK PERFORMANCE

TWO GENERATIONS OF THE TURNER CLAN

COMBINE TALENTS TO CREATE A
FAMILY RETREAT IN KETCHUM, IDAHO, THAT BRINGS A NEW LEVEL OF REFINEMENT TO RUSTIC CHIC

Text by Kathleen Hackett • Photography by Miguel Flores-Vianna

Produced by Anita Sarshik

The Sawtooth Mountains cut a jagged swath across the high blue western sky above Ketchum, Idaho. The American Alps, as they are ambitiously called, cradle more than 300 pristine lakes in their glacier basins. This is Hemingway country—Papa spent the last years of his peripatetic life here—a place he loved for its rugged authenticity and the myriad streams running through it.

The beauty of these majestic mountains (not to mention the world-class skiing) has been luring

Rusty and Mary Lynn Turner and their three children here from their native Newport Beach, California, for more than a quarter century. But it was only three years ago that the couple decided to build their ideal family retreat, one that Mary Lynn, an interior designer, insisted appear as if it had been there all along. "I always wanted to do something rustic," she says, "but I didn't want a luxury log home or a modern ski chalet. I wanted a house that looked like we had rescued it, like we brought it back to life."

In the great room, a pair of George Smith sofas flanks a custom-made sofa by M. Elle Design that is slipcovered in a Rogers & Goffigon fabric; the stone-and-iron cocktail table is by Lucca & Co., the side table is from Holly Hunt, and the curtains are of a Holland & Sherry wool; the overhead beams are reclaimed white oak, and the oak floorboards were treated to appear aged. FACING PAGE: Mary Lynn Turner with her daughters Marie (center) and Emily. See Resources.

Mary Lynn had the perfect partners to see her vision through: her daughters Marie and Emily. With a master's degree in fine and decorative arts from Christie's Education in London and a stint with the internationally renowned David Collins Studio in London under her belt, Marie had some serious design chops. Meanwhile, the accounting skills Emily learned at the London School of Economics kept the numbers end of the business in the family. The trio formed M. Elle Design and took themselves on as their first clients. "My mother and I finish each other's sentences," says Marie, "and we have become excellent editors of each other's ideas."

Indeed, during her European foray, Marie's frequent trips to France kindled a love of the Old World barns that dot the countryside. For years before that, however, Mary Lynn had been tilling away pictures of stone farmhouses snapped on repeated visits to Provence that she knew she would one day draw inspiration from. "For much of my career, I did interiors that define Southern California style," says Mary Lynn. "Meanwhile, I was always dreaming about barns." Together, mother and daughters came up with a scheme to achieve the timeworn yet timeless aesthetic they were after. They adopted the compound approach that marks rural farms, where several buildings, each intended for a specific use, make up the homestead. They worked with architect Bob White of Laguna Beach-based ForestStudio to design a collection of five structures, each clad in a different rough-hewn material and all of which look like they rightfully belong nestled between the mighty Sawtooths and the Big Wood River.

The assemblage began, of course, with a real barn, a 1,000-square-foot great room sided in reclaimed wood that stands at the center of the compound. Windows stretch from the floor to the eaves. "So many mountain homes are dark," says Mary Lynn, "and a barn, traditionally, is too. I didn't want the overscale windows to distract from the design, but I did want to take advantage of the endless sunny days here. We created rather elaborate draperies to control just how much light we want to let in." From there the Turners turned their attention to the limestone house, an equally spacious two stories accommodating a kitchen, the family room, and the master bedroom. A dormered cottage holds the game room and guest quarters, while a mudroom and ultrachic bunk room are installed in the white clapboard farmhouse that branches off from the main residence. "My mother has visions of lots of grandchildren running around here one day," says Marie of her family-oriented parents, "but for now it's pretty much filled with 20-somethings!" Steel-and-glass pass-throughs, roofed in lead-coated copper to effect the patina of zinc, connect the outbuildings to the soaring pitched-roof barn, their ceilings intentionally low slung to dramatize the contrast in scale.

Such meticulous attention to materials doesn't end at the front door. Limestone, reclaimed oak, steel, and wood planks show up throughout the interiors, striking an elegant rusticity. For the fireplace in the great room, for instance, the Turners chose a

The game room's billiard table, bookcases, and sectional sofa are all by M. Elle Design; the leather-upholstered ottoman is by George Smith; and the 1950s iron chair is covered in a Loro Piana fabric; the sconces are from Circa Lighting, and the sisal is by Stark. FACING PAGE: The island and vent hood in the kitchen are custom made by M. Elle Design; the range is by Viking; the refrigerator is by Sub-Zero; and the barstools are by BOOW. See Resources.

A covered porch, paved in gray sandstone tiles, features a driftwood chandelier from Mecox Gardens, a table with a wood trestle base by Custom Furniture & Cabinets, and rattan dining chairs; seating areas crafted of the same limestone as the fireplace hold cushions and pillows covered in Holly Hunt fabrics. The porch serves as an open-air dining pavilion with views of the Sawtooth Mountains. See Resources.

"I ALWAYS WANTED TO DO SOMETHING RUSTIC," SAYS MARY LYNN TURNER, "BUT I DIDN'T WANT A LUXURY LOG HOME OR A MODERN SKI CHALET. I WANTED
A HOUSE THAT LOOKED LIKE WE RESCUED IT, LIKE WE BROUGHT IT BACK TO LIFE"

textured limestone casing. They hand-selected the beams from an old Wisconsin dairy barn, then determined where each would be placed before a single nail was driven. "We didn't want any of them to look too beat-up," says Marie, "or the space would begin to look like a cliché." Indeed, Mary Lynn insisted that the decor not be "too cowboy," though they managed to incorporate stacks of birch logs, hefty blankets, and even an arriér or two into the scheme. Nor did they want the furnishings to compete with the gorgeous shell. There's not a shred of silk or brocade in sight. "We went for linen and wool in neutral shades. They're calming and luxurious in the same way that nature is," says Marie.

With two of her children engaged to be married this year, one could assume that, in the farmstead tradition, the Turners would be planning an expansion. In fact, Mary Lynn admits she dreams of yet another building for the property. "I'd like to add a stone guesthouse," she confides, "but every time I mention it, my husband just rolls his eyes." ■

A tub by Lefroy Brooks in the master bath has fittings by Waterworks; the chandelier is by Lucca Studio, and the Swedish bench is from Sentimento Antiques. The rug by F. J. Hakimian is made of vintage kilims, and the floor is paved in limestone. FACING PAGE: FROM TOP: In a guest room, an Anthropologie canopy bed is dressed with Sferra linens, and the antique suzani is from Nathan Turner; the linen shades and curtains are by C&C Milano. The fir-paneled walls in the bunk room are painted in Farrow & Ball's Pointing, and the adders and bunk beds are custom-made; the pillows are covered in Rogers & Goffigon fabrics, and the curtains are of a linen by Rose Tarlow Melrose House. See Resources.

