PATRICK DRAGONETTE GENTLEMAN'S STUDY

Right: When charged with redefining Greystone's gun room, says Patrick Dragonette, "I wasn't sure how I would honor its history." The great bones and intricate woodwork were a draw, "but a gun room? I'm a pacifist!" Still, all it took was a good night's sleep for him to come up with a solution: "I woke up thinking, 'What if I were to acknowledge the room's past, but in a way I was comfortable with?'" Enter the replica Winchester rifles. "Painting them white gave them a sense of art or sculpture, and—remembering the anti-war posters of the '60s—flowers went in their barrels," the designer says. A horse head-shaped lamp is a whimsical nod to the room's masculine vibe, while birds tiptoe across the coffee table and a giraffe gazes down from its stance atop a console. "I wanted to create an interior in which a man would feel at home, hence all of the animal references," Dragonette says. "It's a man's room, yes, but he's a well-traveled man."
